

Editorial

Respite Care

An Essential Yet Unmet Need for Families With Children With Special Health Care Needs

John M. Neff, MD

Arch Pediatr Adolesc Med

Published Online: January 5, 2009

2009;163;(1):89-90.

doi:10.1001/archpediatrics.2008.527

The timely article by Savithri Nageswaran¹ describes a major unmet need: respite care. Using the 2001 National Survey of Children With Special Health Care Needs, Nageswaran reports that 8.8% of respondents designated a need for respite care. That need was higher in households of a minority race/ethnicity and those with younger children, low maternal education, and low income. It was also higher in people without insurance or with insurance gaps and those with public compared with private insurance. According to the article, the need for respite care increased with functional limitation and unstable health conditions. Twenty-four percent of the caregivers who needed respite care reported that their need was unmet.

Get Access

View Full Text | Download PDF

Sections

PDF

Share