Abstract

Normative tax theory has concentrated on the distribution of tax shares to the neglect of the absolute level of taxation. The first Rawlsian principle of maximal equal liberty is introduced to derive limits on the absolute level of taxation. The critical requirement is that the freedom of persons, singly or in coalitions, to form new political associations be counted as a relevant liberty in the Rawlsian array. Simple examples illustrate the argument, and critical parameters are identified and discussed briefly.

I am indebted to Geoffrey Brennan, David Levy and Loren Lomasky for helpful comments on earlier drafts of this paper.

Notes

- 1 In several earlier papers, written separately and jointly, I have analyzed limits on taxation from a constitutional perspective. See, James M. Buchanan, "Constitutional Constraints on Governmental Taxing Power," ORDO, Bd. 30 (Stuttgart: Fischer, 1979), pp. 334–359; "Procedural and Constitutional Constraints on Fiscal Authority," in The Constitution and the Budget, ed. by W. S. Moore and R. G. Penner (Washington: American Enterprise Institute, 1980), pp. 80–84; "The Limits of Taxation," in The Constitutional Challenge, ed. by M. James (St. Leonard's, N.S.W.: Centre for Independent Studies, 1982), pp. 113–130; and

5 J. R. Kearl has supported the collective claim to a share of valued output along essentially the lines sketched here. Kearl, however, explicitly states that the question as to the extent of this claim “has no quantifiable answer” (p. 80). See, J. R. Kearl, “Do Entitlements Imply that Taxation is Theft?,” Philosophy and Public Affairs, 7 (Fall 1977), 74–81.

9 I am particularly indebted to Loren Lomasky for pointing out to me the Rawlsian emphasis on maximal liberty. I had earlier, like many others, interpreted the first Rawlsian principle largely in terms of the equal liberty element. For a paper in which both these elements of the Rawlsian principle are used, see, James M. Buchanan and Loren Lomasky, “The Matrix of Contractarian Justice” (Draft paper prepared for Liberty Fund Conference on “Liberty and Equality,” Key Biscayne, Florida, November 1983).
