From Hard Money to Branch Banking

California Banking in the Gold-Rush Economy

Larry Schweikart and Lynne Pierson Doti

If Americans associate any event with the early history of California, it is the Gold Rush. When their business reached such a level that it equaled or surpassed their mercantile or freight activities, they often sought a banking charter from the state legislature, although not all “bankers” had charters. The charter usually empowered the banker to issue paper money, called “banknotes” or simply “notes.” Money thus circulated, and competed, against other privately issued money by relying on gold as a standard of measurement, since all notes had to be convertible into gold at some point. More often than not, however, the real determinant of a note’s value rested on its reputation—or, more precisely,
