Abstract

Recent responses to the global economic crash of 2008, such as Occupy Wall Street and other political encampments, have raised important questions about the constitution of the “we” and the relationship between democracy and change in the context of contemporary capitalism. To address these important new political developments, this article argues for “participatory contract building” as a new direction in critical contract theory and participatory democracy. In order to unpack this approach, it analyzes the recent “crowd-sourced” constitution-drafting process in Iceland. It is suggested that this example may provide a platform for a multi-tiered practice of participatory contract building, one that engages the many places in which we find ourselves subject to contractual relations in ways that offer people more opportunities to make meaningful decisions about the power relations that shape our lives.

As several of the essayists in this collection note, it is important to distinguish critiques that are concerned with ways that the participation engendered by these practices might serve to reify existing power relations from those critiques of participation that hold that “generally experts and the state do know better, that managers of development organizations and projects need freedom to act quickly to achieve results, and that people are more interested in short-term substantive livelihood improvement than participation” (Harry Taylor, “Insights into Participation from Critical Management and Labour Processes Perspectives,” in Bill Cooke and Uma Kothari (eds), Participation: The New Tyranny? (London, UK: Zed Books, 2001), p. 138). It is not the value of participation itself but rather the terms and conditions of such participation that are at issue in progressive appraisals of contemporary development approaches.
