Notes

The author would like to thank Julian Cooper, Philip Hanson and Silvana Malle for comments made on previous iterations of this essay. In addition, the insightful comments provided by two anonymous reviewers are gratefully acknowledged. Lucy Buckland also provided helpful research assistance. The usual disclaimers apply.

<sup>2</sup> The terminology of the statecraft literature refers to the country or countries imposing economic measures as 'sender' countries, while the country (or countries) that is the object of statecraft is described as the 'target' country.

<sup>4</sup> David Cameron stated in November 2014 that sanctions were behind the poor economic performance of Russia at that time (Wintour 2014). US President, Barack Obama, went even further, claiming that sanctions had left the Russian economy 'in tatters'.
