Fair Trade, Free Trade and the State

GAVIN FRIDELL

In autumn 2007, I was contacted by a staff member of a new policy journal on the Americas and asked to submit an article on fair trade for an upcoming issue on corporate social responsibility. I was surprised by this request, given that my own work draws heavily on critical political economy and the journal is jointly run by the Americas Society and the Council of the Americas, the latter being a 'premier international business organization' whose corporate members share an explicit devotion to promoting free trade and 'open markets'.¹ I expressed some hesitation to the staff member, who assured me that fair trade issues were of particular interest to the journal's readership. She then added that the editors wanted me to develop an article that was 'forward-looking' and went beyond the basic issues of fair trade to advance a broader policy point. I replied that this would be an excellent idea, as I could write a piece arguing for the need for national and international bodies to adopt fair trade as a matter of state policy, which would entail developing strong international regulations for commodity prices and social, labour and environmental standards. After a short pause, the staff member replied 'you can't say that, that's ideological'.

This telling anecdote is demonstrative of a growing attitude among corporate
