Abstract

The Glasgow gangs of the 1920s and 1930s were widely viewed as fighting gangs rather than as criminal gangs in any wider sense. Retrospective accounts frequently suggest that the gangs only fought each other, leaving 'ordinary' residents of the city's working-class districts safe from the threat of robbery or random assault. This article offers an alternative perspective. It examines widespread reports of extortion by the gangs, whose 'protection' rackets targeted traders in both the legal and illicit sectors of the local economy. It further explores allegations that the gangs mounted a 'Reign of Terror' in the city's East End and South Side. Gang members demanded contributions from local residents towards bail monies and fines, and used violence and intimidation to deter victims and witnesses from testifying to crimes of theft as well as violence in court.

[37] The levying of 'protection' from illicit businesses was rarely highlighted in the local press for obvious reasons. Those targeted could hardly bring criminal charges, and journalists were unlikely to crusade on their behalf. For a hint of extortion from gaming houses, see the Evening Citizen, 30 January 1928, for a report of a police raid which was greeted with relief after the doorkeeper initially feared the intruders to be gang members. For accounts of extortion from bookmakers, see the Weekly Record, 12 July 1930; Sunday Dispatch, 10 March 1935; Sunday Mail, 16 August 1936. For a fictional depiction of gangs targeting brothel keepers, see McArthur and Watts, No Bad Money. Forbes and Meehan claimed that the gangs with greater criminal ambitions organised shebeens, Such Bad Company, 65.

- [113] Attitudes towards gang fighting among the wider populations of districts such as the Gorbals are difficult to discern. Not surprisingly, many passers-by appear to have been terrified. Others, however, appear to have regarded fights between rival gangs as providing a worthwhile spectacle. See the Evening Citizen, 6 August 1930.
