I have received helpful comments on drafts of this article from numerous colleagues and friends, the guest editors, two journal referees and participants in the workshop 'Unpacking Aid Effectiveness' convened by Nilima Gulrajani at the London School of Economics on 21 June 2011. The work received support from APPP, a consortium research programme funded by the UK's Department for International Development (DFID) and Irish Aid for the benefit of developing countries. The views expressed are my own and not to be attributed to DFID, Irish Aid or any of those acknowledged above.

Notes

1. OECD, Paris Declaration. The evidence base was large and diverse but was captured in the literature of the period by, among others, van de Walle and Johnston, Improving Aid; Killick, Aid and the Political Economy; World Bank, Assessing Aid; Booth, Fighting Poverty; and Koeberle et al., Conditionality Revisited.

2. Unfortunately, some aid practitioners have fallen into the habit of referring to the Paris commitments including the ones on aid effectiveness (principles) as 'contracting' them as behavior. In this case, 'respect' the spirit of the Paris Declaration. The importance of the relationship between the government and the donor is highlighted by Tull, 'Postcon'.

3. It is not clear from the text whether the author is referring to the approach of the L. This approach to ownership and leadership and survey has been used a development strategy and be impossible (and controversial) to measure. Even in these narrow terms, however, most countries get a medium to low rating (OECD, Aid Effectiveness 2005-10, 30).

4. The tendency for political competition to give public policy-making an extremely short-term orientation, and therefore a limited ability to address the real challenges of national development, is a standard theme in political science work on the majority of sub-Saharan African countries. Two of the most telling examples of the modal pattern are treated in depth by Lewis, Growing Apart; and Mutua, Kenya's Quest for Democracy. The much discussed recent improvements in economic growth rates and some social indicators across the region do not justify a revision of this basic diagnosis, partly for the reasons given by Amoako, 'Transforming Africa'; and ECA and AU, Economic Report on Africa: African economies need transformation, not just growth, and the politics of transformation are very demanding.

49. Of course, donor agencies face their own severe problems of collective action, notably when attempting to impose governance conditionalities in a consistent way on recipient countries. That might suggest that they would be unlikely to be good at solving those of others. However, the kinds of interventions illustrated above are alternatives to conditionality and other devices that depend on direct and coordinated donor action. That is one of their advantages.

50. See Eyben, 'Hiding Relations'.

51. Glennie, Trouble with Aid, 105–106. That is, it costs relatively little and involves less conflict with powerful interest groups than measures in the fields of trade, small arms and financial regulation that could contribute more to poverty reduction.

52. For a fuller account of these issues which differs from mine only on details, see Unsworth, 'What's Politics Got to Do With It?'.
