that constitute the economy, markets and associated modes of power. Finally, the paper argues for a particular way of analysing the economy and its constituent practices. Most generally, this means suggesting a focus on the governing of economic life, the linkages and interdependencies between calculative practices and programmes for governing, and the assemblages formed.

Thanks are due to the editors of this journal for comments on an early draft of this paper. Thanks are due also to colleagues at the London School of Economics and Political Science, and to participants there in the seminar on Accounting, Organizations and Institutions. Particular thanks are due to Andrea Mennicken for her comments on the paper, and also to Anthony Hopwood for his encouragement with the initial version of the paper.

- 4. See Callon (1998), Hopwood and Miller (1994), Miller and Rose (2008) and Power (1997).
- 5. The index does not even feature the word accounting, although the chapter by Carruthers is notable for its coverage of measurement problems and the roles of accounting.
- 6. The recently emergent sociology of finance confirms the relatively distinct nature of finance as discipline and practice (see Beunza & Stark 2004; Kalthoff 2005; Knorr-Cetina & Bruegger 2002; Knorr-Cetina & Preda 2005; Mackenzie 2003, 2004, 2006; Mackenzie & Millo 2003).
- 7. Of course, any such assemblage is highly permeable, and subject to a more or less permanent process of 'hybridisation' (Miller, Kurunmäki & O'Leary 2007 forthcoming; see also Miller et al. forthcoming).
- 8. See, for instance, Miller and Rose (1986).
- 9. See Miller and O'Leary (2007 forthcoming); Kurunmäki (2004); Mennicken (2007 forthcoming).
- 10. On this, see also Mirowski and Nik-Khan (2007).
