Abstract

For some, global finance is ubiquitous. The growth of advanced electronic communications combined with computer-driven, top-down investment strategies has provided institutional investors access to the most sheltered capital markets, including those of continental Europe. By contrast, many economic geographers find this view of capital accumulation. More systematically, we report the results of statistical analyses of the volatility of daily stock-market prices for German DAX30 and DAX100 firms, arguing that their apparent characteristics have important lessons for the value and significance of bottom-up portfolio investment strategies. These results, combined with case studies of the two German firms, are used to suggest that the geography of finance remains a vital component of global investment strategies, an argument that has important implications for academic analysis inside and outside of geography.

their matching social and economic relationships (e.g., Clark, Mansfield, and Tickell 2002).

- 4. "Abnormal return" is defined as the difference between the actual return on a security and the return implied by the level of market return (in this case, the return on the whole Swiss stock market) and the security's sensitivity to market return. For details see, for example, Bodie, Kane, and Marcus (2002).
- 5. Open-end mutual funds continually issue new shares as people invest their money. They also buy back these shares when investors wish to sell. This is in contrast to closed-end funds, which raise their initial capital by selling a fixed number of shares in a process similar to selling a new stock issue. After this initial offering, the fund is closed—hence its name.
- 6. The Amtlicher Handel is one of the four segments of the German stock market, along with the Geregelter Markt (regulated market), the Freiverkehr (over-the-counter market) and the Neuer Markt (new market, opened in 1997 and meant for young growth firms). Companies listed on the Amtlicher Handel have to comply with stricter disclosure requirements compared to the Geregelter Markt and the Freiverkehr. The shares are traded not only on the Frankfurt Stock Exchange, but also on the seven regional exchanges (in Berlin, Bremen, Düsseldorf, Hamburg, Hannover, München, and Stuttgart). In 2000, however, Frankfurt accounted for over 80 percent of the trading volume.
- 7. Rodríguez-Pose and Zademach (Forthcoming) show that when we compare mergers and acquisitions by companies headquartered in Munich (Bavaria) with those by companies headquartered in Düsseldorf and Cologne (North Rhine-Westphalia), the incidence of intraregional transactions is considerably lower for the cities in North Rhine-Westphalia. This supports our empirical findings concerning a more closed
