Putin and the Oligarchs

RICHARD SAKWA

During the election campaign and in his State of the Nation address of 8 July 2000, President Vladimir Putin talked of the need to break the cosy relationship between big business and government. In early 2000 Putin had talked, in language reminiscent of Joseph Stalin's plan in 1929 to 'liquidate the kulaks as a class', of his aspiration to 'liquidate the oligarchs as a class', stressing the need to create a level playing field.¹ His central idea was that special interests, above all the oligarchs, should be kept 'equidistant' from the government.² No longer were a select group of 'oligarchs' to have privileged access to the corridors of power or to hold the state hostage whenever the regime needed financial or other support. Putin's approach is neatly summed up in his interview with the Spanish media in early 2006:

Back in the mid-1990s oligarchic groups substituted for government in Russia. They were elected to parliament and lobbied laws beneficial for specific financial and industrial groups instead of the society. They also ensured fulfilment of these laws through their representatives in high places. I do not think this meets the public interest.³

The empirical analysis is probably correct, yet the policy implications that emerge out of such a view had wide ramifications. In this essay we will focus on three. The first was a series of selective attacks against certain major business figures, notably Vladimir Gusinsky at the head of the Media-Most media concern and Mikhail Khodorkovsky at the head of the Yukos oil company. The manner of the attack undermined the independence of the media and the judiciary. The second is the development of a new model of political economy, in which the state reasserted not only its alleged prerogatives over economic policy, pipeline routes and the like, but challenged the inviolability of property rights as a whole to create a
